B. S. WHITE PAINE.

We sing the dear songs of the olden time-Once sang by the voices long hushed in death, We hum the sweet strains of the Sabbath chime That floated away on the Spring's warm breath.

We summon from shades of the distant past The beautiful things that we buried there, And tenderly fancy their forms recast And clothed with the glamor they used to wear

We muse on the landscape so passing fair That ravished the eye in life's early morn. And pine for the fragrance that filled the air From the new mown clover and tassled corn ;

From the mint-fringed banks of the sparkling brook. From odorous trellis in field and wood. Where wild vines fashioner, the shady nook For the thrush that is si ging "God is good!"

We wonder, is aught as it used to be Round the dear old homestead where we wer Do other eyes the same objects see?

And the same fair flower the fields adorn? Has the woodman's ax wrought no ruthless change On the tree-clad slopes where the woodbin Has the red deer gone from the tangled range

Where the drumming partridge before him flew Does the old retreat by the rugged hill Wear the same wild beauty as years go round? Does to a trailing arbutus bloom there still. Mang the winter-green berries that redden the Ah! vainly we question, we wait in vain; All else, save a plaintive ceho, is dumb; "Adieu." we breathe with a nameless pain, And sigh for the answers that never come.

If the Comet Fails into the Sun-

A word in your ear, my punctilious friend, So erect, so austere, and so sober-It doesn't much matter what money you spend Between this and the coming October. I beg you reflect that your chequered career Can't be troubled by bailiff or dim-That, in short, you're "fixed up "-you've got nothing to fear

If the comet falls into the sun. With impressive solemnity, charming conceit, Piazzi and Proctor have reckoned That a milky-tailed comet, all head and no feet, Can dispose of our earth in a second.

If your wife's too severe-if your boots are too If the horse that you backed didn't run-How delightful to think it will all be set right

When the comet falls into the sun, In the flash of dark eyes-in soft whispers and There are charms for the gay and the sober ;

In our way on this side of October. There are churches for sinners, and balls and good

It's as well we should grasp all the pleasure that

For those who've a fancy for fun; If you're merry, you bet, you'll have less to regret When the comet falls into the sun.

Still, to let joking be-if our globe's "up a tree". Twere unwise to be selfish and greedy, And button our pockets at Carnival time Without helping the aged and needy. Before turning your back, gentle sir, think of this, That whatever the ills you have done,

To have helped on your neighbors won't stand you When the comet falls into the sun. E. T. F.
